SUBJECT : Briefing for Local Chiefs of Police

In discussing the arrangements for traffic control around my house on Saturday, the 24th of April, with Chief Murray Kutner of the Fairfax City Police, he mentioned to me the fact that he had recently attended an all-day briefing at the National Security Agency with some 47 local Chiefs of Police who have dealings with NSA or have NSA employees resident in their jurisdictions.

This appears to me to be an excellent public relations idea and I think we should emulate it. They would all be delighted to be invited to CIA and we could do a good briefing for them without going above the "confidential" level. We could include such subjects as our pre-employment investigation program and how it is handled, our use of the polygraph, our handling of employee relations to keep track of their security and suitability--each of which would take at least an hour. Then I would propose that we serve them lunch in one of the dining rooms and in small groups show them our security control system; they might also be interested in our computer centers--particularly the developing automation of personnel records--and perhaps we should get Byron Engle over to talk about the [redacted]

[redacted] I think we could work out a very full day and one that would interest them and would return us immense dividends.
